Catretts hold Butler ceremony

BUTLER -- Miss Regina Onganon Catrett shows off the exquisite bridal gown that she wore when she and Mr. Barry Catrett were united in marriage on Saturday, March 24 at Calvary Baptist Church in Butler. The couple also held ceremonies in her home country of the Philippines last year.

The right bridal gown is key to the fairy tale

(BNN) What film fan does not recall the memorable line from Tinseltown's best rendition of the Cinderella story—the movie Pretty Woman—when the dashing Richard Gere, in gentle exasperation, asks Julia Roberts what exactly she wants. Without hesitation, the pretty woman replies, "I want the fairy tale."

Her words are doubtless echoed by every bride-to-be, regardless of station, as she dreams of being a princess on her wedding day. And a key ingredient of that fantasy (along with the handsome prince) is the extraordinary wedding gown—the dress of her dreams.

The wedding gown has a romantic history, as do those precious words, "I do." The tradition of the bride's wearing white began in the 19th century with the marriage of British Queen Victoria to her beloved Prince Albert.

Of course, styles of the wedding gown have changed with time, but the meaning to the bride-to-be remains the same—it must be a breathtaking dress for a once-in-a-lifetime day.

The Carmela Sutura collection, for example, is known for exceptionally high standards in choice of fabrics, quality of construction, embroidery, laces, and trims. The fabrics, mostly imported from Italy, are chosen with extreme care—featuring fabulous silks and linen blends, silk taffeta, silk Mikado, and the glorious duchess silk satin.

Likewise admired are the exquisite re-embroidered laces and lace touches and the rare technique of placing the lace properly—key to the quality of the gown. Another signature is the stunning, unique embroideries based on antique designs.

To have a made-to-order gown enables any bride to luxuriate in a dress fashioned to her individual style and personality, while experiencing the workmanship and personal attention that are rare in the modern world.

A combination of brilliant embroidery and sumptuous fabrics bring magic and romance to any wedding dress, giving it a majestic look—and making the altar-bound wearer a true princess, ready to live her fairy tale.
